There are a multitude of voices and thousands of tendencies in pedagogy addressing particular approaches to leadership. The most important voice for Christian leaders that we need to listen to these days is Simplicity and especially what Jesus has to say about leadership. We are so caught up with what the world says about becoming a leader and so overwhelmed by the sheer mass of information and communication allure. But let us not make our models for leadership in our churches and training systems synonymous with Jesus' words, and yet to what extent do they facilitate communication? In light of this, the answer is that our models for leadership in our churches are not very helpful.

Firstport, in a new parable, is trying to rediscover the archetypal parable of Jesus. Jesus' parables often reveal the root myth of our communities and the center of the moral structure that gives a particular community its identity and character. Jesus' parables are often about the meaning of our lives, the meaning of our society, and the meaning of our existence. They are often about the meaning of our lives, the meaning of our society, and the meaning of our existence. They are often about the meaning of our lives, the meaning of our society, and the meaning of our existence. They are often about the meaning of our lives, the meaning of our society, and the meaning of our existence. They are often about the meaning of our lives, the meaning of our society, and the meaning of our existence. They are often about the meaning of our lives, the meaning of our society, and the meaning of our existence. They are often about the meaning of our lives, the meaning of our society, and the meaning of our existence. They are often about the meaning of our lives, the meaning of our society, and the meaning of our existence.